Thirty years ago, the primary connections between the words vocation and education had mostly to do with trade schools; today, concepts of vocation and calling have often been accompanied by a marked increase in attention to issues of meaning, purpose, and identity across all sectors of society. This focus is particularly noticeable in higher education, and especially so in the time and place that we designate as “the undergraduate years.” During these years, institutions seek to offer students a reasonable amount of time, and a relatively unconstrained space, within which they can think about the kinds of lives they want to live and the kinds of people they want to be. How might educators take more advantage of this opportunity and find ways to enhance our students’ experiences of vocational exploration and discernment?

The participants in this seminar will bring to the table their experiences with vocation on their own campuses, whether in teaching, research, writing, service, or inter-office cooperation. Seminar discussions will also cover a range of activities that can enhance vocational exploration in undergraduate education. Some attention will be given to direct work with students, whether through classroom teaching, advising co-curricular activities, or mentoring students. However, this will not be the primary focus on the seminar. The primary focus of this seminar will extend beyond classroom applications to include research, writing, and institutional leadership on the topic of vocation.
